

Cohesive Devices

Task: Match the key cohesive devices to the correct parts of the text by colour coding

Pronouns
Adverbials of time
Adverbials of place
Adverbials of manner
Co-ordinating conjunctions
Subordinating conjunctions
Determiner

Way above the clouds, there lived a mighty god name Zeus; he fired off thunderbolts from his fingers, and he set fire to whole cities. As boredom reigned over Mount Olympus, Zeus asked Hephaistos to take some clay and make the first woman. Because Hephaistos agreed, Zeus felt content.

Prometheus was filling one of his endless days by making a little figure out of clay, for he didn't know that this task had been summoned upon another god. After playing for a while, he made it look like a tiny god, so he moved its legs and it appeared to dance. Once completed, he gently blew onto his clay figure, giving life to the man.

A long time ago, on an island called Crete, there lived a king named Minos. King Minos, who was known across all of Ancient Greece, had a powerful navy, a beautiful daughter and a vast, desirable palace. However, he still grew bored of his life. Whenever he became bored, he would march his navy across the sea to launch a vicious attack on a town called Athens.

The King of Athens grew tired of King Minos attacking his town, and in desperation, he made a deal with him. If Minos would leave Athens alone, they would send seven Athenian girls and seven Athenian boys to Crete every nine years - to be eaten by the Minotaur.

The Minotaur was a monster that was half human and half bull. He lived in the centre of a huge maze on the Island of Crete. King Minos loved his horrible monster, so he ensured that he was well-fed. As King Minos was loyal to his followers, he knew that they would be much more appreciative if the Minotaur was fed Athenian children. Although this task seemed simple, there was more than meet the eye with the royalty of Athens.